I once said: " @Silas_BTD6 What seems to be happening is that many women on social media appear to be intentionally overwhelming male viewers who watch their TikTok shorts with negativity & toxicity. I'm not sure what their motives are for doing this. Just as someone can have a toxic partner in real life, you can also encounter toxic people on the internet. @tradertrader6070 says these women are attacking masculinity. However, I think a more accurate way to describe it would be: "Misandry whispers, the balance is gone. Every man is a verdict before the day even dawn." The truth is that the internet/TV/Cars/A-Car-World has made us all more disconnected from one another. The dating world is dead, and economic pressures have left the current generation not understanding each other well enough. One problem I see with feminism is that, if I look at it from a religious, faith-based perspective, where women take from it teachings on how to live, I might come to a conclusion like this: a world that values domination over others, a world that rewards selfishness and not caring about anyone but yourself, a world that even rewards being cruel to others, especially human males.. It's important to understand why all of this exists. Many feminists around the world would say feminism exists because of the patriarchy (or rapists). However, I don't believe the patriarchy really exists anymore. If this is about rejecting what society considers beautiful, then women are free to remove their makeup and wear clothes that don't sexualize them. In my view, the patriarchy does not exist in the Western world. So going up to any random man on the street and giving him the middle finger is delusional. and that's what women online are doing when they post their short tik tok videos. What women call the patriarchy is probably just a small number of men who happen to be extremely rich in the united states, such as the founder of Amazon. Any woman can become a rich capitalist. If you hate rich capitalists, then you are not hating the patriarchy, you are hating capitalism. In today's world, women do not have to stay in the kitchen, do not have to get married, and do not have to have children. They are free to become rich capitalists, the President of the United States, or whatever they choose. And if you have questions about rape, any man or woman can commit the act of rape, that is fuck someone without their consent. Some feminists mention religion, as if that proves that men are eternally patriarchal. I see feminism as similar to an anarchist playlist, with music that helps you cope with the coldness of the world. Past cultures and religions have indeed oppressed women, but there is one that is constantly mentioned to justify the extreme existence of radical feminism: Islam. My comment on that is this: you have no idea what Islam says. Learn Arabic and recite the Quran, or listen to it being recited. Feminists within the Muslim world exist, and their goal is to dismantle the patriarchy that has been embedded in Islam by warlords in the made up Hadith, Narrations, a goal I support. A recognition that we are all flawed and capable of mistakes, and that we should see ourselves as humans, equally human, regardless of gender. "The merciful are shown mercy by the Most Merciful (God). Be merciful to those on the earth, and the One in the heavens will show mercy to you." By rejecting Western stereotypes that place extra burdens on women, such as makeup and other societal markers that make women appear separate from men, we can begin to see each other simply as people, rather than through the distorted lens we currently have. The current view of women is, in fact, a major factor in generating so many rapists: women are treated as products. Some are considered “gorgeous,” others not; their value is judged purely by appearance. That’s why I say if women could shed all of these societal markers, we could see each other simply as people. For example, pornography trained me to view women as products, the beautiful ones are “worth” more. What society defines as female beauty is largely a lie. If women were to remove makeup, they would look more like men, a surprising truth for men who are extremely disconnected socially from women: they are humans, just like men. Likewise, ideas like the “perfect vagina” are fabricated myths that further objectify women. By peeling away these false standards, women can be seen as normal people, rather than commodities to be judged or used.

I said this on February 17, 2026, in a comment section on the internet.